HB26/17/011	96 Malone Road ('Montpellier')	J3295 7155	Listed 21/05/1980. House including archway. Mildly Italianate, 2-storey hipped slated roof suburban residence of 1875-76, stucco façade, canted bays, overhanging bracketed verge, decorative entrance surround. On a slight rise on the E side of the Malone Road, with further properties to its immediate rear. Two centrally located tall rendered chimneystacks, each with a string course, cornice course and four octagonal pots. There is a narrow brick chimneystack to the return gable, with one cylindrical pot. Cast iron rw goods. Small garden to front of house, larger garden to S. Large enclosed rear yard with a large 2-storey former outbuilding. Only part of the ground floor of this outbuilding belongs to no.96, the rest of it is divided into apartments (no.98). House built in 1875-76. It stands on a parcel of land, which previously belonged to property just to the east, 'Montpellier', (present no.100) a house erected in c.1840. Developed in 1875-76 by building this house (which incidentally also became known as 'Montpellier'), 'Cariton House' to the north, (the present nos.92 and 94), and, in 1878, a large villa to the south (now demolished). Outbuilding complex to rear of the house appears to have been originally split between this property, no.100 to the east, and no.102 to the south (now demolished). This complex appears in the 1890s at least- appears to have contained living quarters which appear to have belonged to no.100. In 1912 a storey was added to the complex creating a much larger property, appropriately named 'The Nook'. In 1968 The Nook was split into two separate properties, one to each floor.	B2

HB26/01/004	Gate Lodge, Good Shepherd Convent, Ormeau Road	349712	Listed 21/09/1981. Including Boundary Walls and Pillars. Gates/ Screens/ Lodges. Brick-built and rendered, 1.5-storey lodge to what P.Lamour describes as "the large 3-storey red brick Penitentiary Building of the Catholic refuge by Sherry and Hughes 1868-69". Elevation facing the road contains two pairs of segmentally-headed windows below 2 single-gabled eaves dormers, also containing segmentally headed window openings. Entrance is gained to lodge from public footpath, through a recessed porch on left-hand corner of front elevation. L-shaped in plan, it was extended in 1895 by J.J.McDonnell. J.A.K.Dean noted that "it was formerly 2-bay rectangular but later enlarged by a bay, in matching manner." Now blocked up but apparently well maintained, it is close to row of Rosetta cottages.	B1

HB26/01/006	513-529 Ormeau Road and 2 Carolan Road (aka Rosetta Cottages)	349712	Listed 04/06/1992. House - Terrace. Said to be "unique survivors within the city boundaries of a once ubiquitous house type". Simple terrace of single-storey shops and dwellings. First recorded as saddlers' cottages, known as 'Rosetta Cottages' in 20th Century when their initial residential function changed to mostly commercial, with the opening on the corner of a shop that is still in use. The majority are now boarded up, after having been vested a number of years ago for a proposed road scheme. Their vernacular scale and materials, and slight tilt of tiny chimney stacks are unique in Belfast.	B2

	Chrome Hill, Lambeg		A 17th century Vernacular House. Original small farm dwelling, out of which the present house has grown, was probably built sometime during second half of 17th century by the Wolfenden family, whose name is closely associated with the early linen industry in this area of the Lagan Valley. Chrome Hill was both a farm house and a factory owner's home, and has continued to be so until the beginning of this century. In 1830, the Lambeg works, by then also producing cotton goods, calico and muslin, were sold to Richard Niven of Manchester. It was Niven who rechristened the house Chrome Hill - earlier been known variously as Harmony Hill and Lambeg House - to commemorate his discovery of the use of bichromates for textile printing. He died in 1866, but his widow lived on at Chrome Hill until her death in 1899. The previous year, house had been purchased by John Milligen, a Belfast coal merchant and property speculator. He, however, only lived in it for a few years, before moving to Glenmore in 1901. House was rented to Major Adam Jenkins and subsequently to Benjamin Hobson, whose family owned the linen works at Ravernet. In 1921, Milligen sold the house to F. G. Barrett and shortly afterwards, disposed of all his property in Lambeg, including Glenmore. In 1924, Barrett sold the building to Mrs. Downer, who remained in possession of the house for the next forty-three years. In 1967, after her death, Chrome Hill came on the market and Robert McKinstry bought it. Abraham Wolfenden's original 17th century vernacular house can be unravelled from the later additions, by looking at the existing ground plan and taking particular note of the large, very deep chimney breast in the room which has always been the kitchen, immediately to the right as one enters through the front door. The unusually large scale of this chimney breast indicates that it must be the original hearth. With the front end forming part of the lobby to the first entrance door, the lines of which are still recognisable in an existing wall recess in this part of the front wall of the house. At far end of this chimney breast, there was originally a small staircase which connected to the room or loft above. A few crumbling steps of this staircase can still be seen from inside the roof space, by means of shining a light vertically into and down through the first floor timber-framed wall, beside sitting room fireplace. Chrome Hill developed from a two unit, two storeyed or lofted house of hearth/lobby formation, with the stairs at the rear of the chimney stack between it and the back wall. This practice is commonly seen in English hearth/lobby houses of the 17th century, but is rarely found in Northern Ireland. Around the 1760s (judging by the style of architectural detail), the original house was heightened, remodelled and extended, by adding a three storey wing on to the west side, three rooms long. The difference in floor levels between the old and new blocks, and the way they are set at right angles to each other, suggests that this wing may have already existed as a cloth store, positioned close to the house for security, giving the building a T-shaped form. At this time, the front door was moved westwards by three bays, to open into a proper little entrance hall, made out of the front part of the second room in the original house. From here, a fine staircase was built to a spacious landing (a duplicate of the entrance hall), which leads into a large sitting room made out of the original loft above the hearth room. These changes of the 1760s reflect the relatively more sophisticated, formal and even spacious life style of the 18th century factory owner. This is underlined by the architectural embellishments introduced as part of the improvements and sometimes applied with little regard for symmetry and regularity. The effect of this robust classical detailing gives Chrome Hill its unique character. There is the carved sandstone pedimented entrance doorway with cushioned freize, and the lugged architraves which are found around nearly all the six fielded panel doors in the house and repeated in the window architraves. Behind these, all the panelled shutters are still in working order. A particularly attractive feature of these windows is the little window seat set well down below the actual window sill and carried out beyond the window reveals, to form a base for the architraves. There is a small fully panelled room which served as a library. Good joinery work in the staircase - sturdy turned balusters, three to a step, and double newel posts. Above the main staircase and hanging over it, rises the little winding attic stairs, which disappear into the ceiling in a delightfully unexpected way. A little semi-dome forms a sloping archway over the four steps from the first floor landing, to two of the bedrooms in the west block. This archway theme is repeated below, at each end of the entrance hall. The 18th century cornices only survive in the hall above the staircase, on the landing and in the room at the back of the hall (now lower hall). Here, on the ceiling, is the only example of decorative plasterwork: two rectangular panels with reeded frames, containing rococo scrolls and central circular panel with the Wolfenden arms, consisting of a chevron between three wolves' heads. The first floor sitting room has a large Venetian window in the back wall, facing north, and its panelled dado containing two little 'secret' jib doors. That on the right side of the gray and white marbled mantel was once a cupboard, while that to the left opened on to the hearth staircase. However, the 17th century origins of the room are still obvious in the two corner windows facing south. These have hardly any vertical architraves at their corner sides, because the original low loft
HB19/17/004 B	Wolfenden Tomb, Lambeg Parish Churchyard, Lambeg		Listed 24/08/1977. Mausoleum of 1693. The earliest gravestone in the Wolfenden enclosure in Lambeg churchyard records the death of Jean Wolfenden 'wife of Abraham Wolfenden deceased September ye 15th 1693 aged 43 years'. This Abraham may well be the Abraham Wolfenden referred to in the 1719 volume of the Hertford Estate's Rental and Account Books as having rented the mills at Ballyskeagh (their size being 25 acres 2 roods 31 perches) at a rent of £7 18s.⁵ if he was not the builder of Chrome Hill, he is its earliest known occupant. In 1690, he is said to have supplied the timber needed to repair one of King William's wagons, when it broke down at the ford over the Lagan, where the Wolfenden Bridge now stands. The King is said to have waited in Abraham's house, while the wagon was being mended. The 'M. Richard Wolfenden of Lambeg, linen draper', referred to on one of the gravestones, was probably Abraham's son. He married Margaret Waring and died in 1743, at the age of seventy. His son, the second Richard (1723-75), married Jane Usher of Aghalee. Their son, the third Richard (1757-1816), married Mary Gayner, the daughter of Edward Gayner of Derriaghy, a friend of John Wesley. Wesley's Journal of 10 June 1787 records a visit to Chrome Hill. While he was there, he is said to have twisted two beech saplings together (to symbolize the continual union of Methodism and the Church of Ireland), and formed what still survives as two large intertwining beech trees, known as Wesley's Tree'. Richard's sister, Anne Jane, married another neighbour, John Charley of Finaghy House, who has served his time under her father. The last Wolfenden to be buried in Lambeg churchyard was John (1788-1829). Though a Thomas Wolfenden is recorded as being a Churchwarden in Lambeg Parish Church as late as 1886, the family had by this time moved to Dublin and become muslin factors at the Linen Hall.

	Ringfort of Lissue, Blaris		Excavated Ringfort. In place-names, two words commonly refer to ringforts. The first is Rath, the anglicised form of Irish ráith, literally meaning an 'earthen bank'. Rathmore-'great fort'-near Antrim is an example. The other word is Lis, Irish lios (earlier les), literally meaning a 'courtyard' or 'enclosure'. This is the first element in the townland name Lissue, Irish Lios-Áedha 'the fort of (a person called) Aed'. At Lissue, a very substantial portion of the interior was carefully excavated during the summers of 1946 and 1947, under the direction of Dr. Gerhard Bersu, a leading German archaeologist, and Mrs. Bersu, and the preliminary results were promptly published in the Ulster Journal of Archaeology. Ringfort of Lissue, three miles west of Lisburn has an unexcavated appearance. It lies on the eastern slope of a small hill, or drumlin, just below its summit at 130 feet (40 metres) above sea-level. It has one surrounding bank-and-ditch and the entrance faces downhill (to the east). With a diameter of some 200 feet (60 metres), it is, however, rather larger than usual. Poor drainage in this heavy local clay means that much of the internal area and the ditch are often waterlogged. It means that organic material, such as wooden vessels, or the seeds of plants and crops, may be preserved. It was immediately apparent to Dr. Bersu that the interior of the ringfort had been cultivated during the 19th century by the use of spade ridges. This widespread recent use of the interiors of ringforts is always destructive of much of the archaeological evidence, and Lissue had not escaped. But Dr. Bersu was a meticulous excavator and even where cultivation had been heavy, he found archaeological remains. He also found that the erosion, and deliberate partial levelling of the bank had, prior to this cultivation, covered the part of the interior just inside the bank with a protective layer of extra soil. This had preserved enough underlying evidence to allow a reconstruction of the history and original appearance of the site. Dr. Bersu also discovered that by a happy chance (and unusually in such sites) the presumably continuous waterlogging of the interior since its abandonment over a thousand years ago had, in many cases, preserved the stumps of original oak posts in the ringfort. He uncovered enough of the interior of the enclosure to ascertain the plan of the structures formed by these posts and others that had since rotted, and an unusual reconstruction it was. A detailed description of the soils and layers uncovered by Dr. Bean, and his arguments for their reconstruction, will have to await the final report. Suffice it here to outline the archaeology of the site as he interpreted it. FIRST RINGFORT Dr. Bersu discovered that there had been a small ringfort on the site prior to the construction of the one now visible. Virtually none of its interior or bank survived the later occupation and use of the site, but he completely emptied a substantial stretch of its steep-sided, six feet (two metres) deep, flat bottomed ditch of its fill. At the bottom was a thin muddy silt in which was embedded much organic debris, such as sticks, wooden vessels and animal bones, as well as pottery, all thrown in by the occupants. Wooden objects were by far the most interesting artifacts, having been preserved due to the waterlogged nature of the ditch with its impermeable clay sides. Included in this material were a number of fine, though now fragmentary, beech or alder bowls made on a lathe. Indeed, the waste pieces from the making of these bowls, and perhaps even portions of the lathe, were also found, so showing that the bowls were made at Lissue. Pieces of leather shoes were also found, one

HB19/16/003	Assembly Rooms and The Market House, Market Square, Lisburn		Listed 18/12/1979. Conservation Area. c 1707. In 1980, the removal of plaster from the ground floor interior walls of the Assembly Rooms in Market Square, to prepare them for their new use as Lisburn Museum, led to the exciting discovery of substantial stone walls with red sandstone arches, plinth and plat band. The walls, three feet thick, belong to the old market house which, with three arches on north and south sides and one at the east end, is described in late 18th and early 19th century sources. The market house was believed to date from the early 18th century, for Lisburn was rebuilt after a disastrous fire of 1707, and it was thought that the market house was rebuilt in the following year. However, this assumption overlooked a contemporary description of the fire by the Rev. Alexander McCracken, Presbyterian minister in Lisburn, which states '... there is not a house standing except the Market House'. This encouraged a comparison of the market house arches with another semi-circular archway in Lisburn which was built of the same red sandstone-the gateway in Castle Gardens. This was the entrance through the east courtyard wall of Lisburn castle, a 17th century manor house built by the Conways and also destroyed in the fire of 1707. The gateway, with its baroque ornamentation, is much more elaborate than the market house arches but is of importance because it is dated 1677. This dating proves that this local stone was used for building in 17th century Lisburn. Substantial structures were capable of surviving a fire which otherwise could entirely destroy a town consisting largely of timber framed buildings. The market house walls are therefore probably of the 17th century. The establishment of a more specific dating than this requires an examination of Lisburn's early market development. established in the second decade of the 17th century as the manorial headquarters of Sir Fulke Conway's newly acquired Killultagh estate. In 1627, the right of a weekly market and two fairs in Lisburn was granted to Sir Fulke's brother and successor, Edward, Viscount Conway and Killultagh. Tuesday was fixed as the market day and the fairs were to begin on July 10th and September 24th and last for three days. The surviving Conway papers from these years show their concern to capitalise on this grant and to see a thriving market established, but do not refer to the building of a market house. Yet one had been erected by 1641, for it was referred to as being the scene of fierce fighting in the market place during the battle for Lisnagarvey, in the Irish rebellion of that year. It can be surmised that, if it still served as a school, it was a two storey building with a market area below and a schoolroom above. Perhaps, when the first market house was built in the 1630s, the school was moved to another site. In the 1680s, 'the old schoolhouse' was in serious need of repair and there is nothing to suggest that it also served as a market house. In his consideration of the old school as a new free school for the diocese of Connor, it seems unlikely that Lord Conway would have agreed to settle the building and its site for further school development, if the school was in the centre of the market place. Letters in 1666 to Lord Conway from Sit George Rawdon (his principal agent in Lisburn from 1631 to 1684) reveal that a Maurice Griffiths had had a lease of the market tolls and had built a market house at his own expense. If Maurice Griffiths had a long lease, he was the builder of the market house which was in existence by 1641. It is also possible that if that building was severely damaged in the bitter fighting which took place in and around it then, that Griffiths's market house replaced it sometime after that, in the more settled years of the Commonwealth or Charles II's restoration. Whatever the date of erection of Griffiths's building may be, the fact that it existed in 1666 almost certainly relates it to the fascinating representation of the market house on the John Peers Lisburn trade token. It has been argued convincingly that this token is not a conventional representation, but a depiction of an actual building. Certainly, it seems (as has been indicated) that the line of semi-circles above the base line represent market house arcading rather than church windows. Unfortunately, no evidence can be found to show that Peers, like More, operated from the market house, though this is most likely. In 1666, at the end of Griffiths's lease, stewardship of the markets was given to John Totnall, a man of business in Lord Conway's service, who sublet the collection of the market customs to William Stephens. Rawdon reports on Stephen's death in 1677, explaining that Totnall had £30 a year rent for him, £20 for himself and £10 for Lord Conway. Irish trade tokens date between 1653 and 1679. The Peers token is not dated, but as it is marked Lisburn rather than Lisnagarvey, it suggests a dating after 1662, since the name Lisburn is not found commonly before then. Peers's	B1
